After having read the Leelanau Ticker article by Craig Manning on Ja8, 2024, I believe your hostile work environment might just extend beyond the work place and into the community.

I found it interesting this article mentions by name only those individuals who may hold conservative ideals or republican principles. The article states how board members felt about one individual. Why not mention what was said about other board members as well? I mean in all fairness, why not publish what "the group of 3" concerns are? Are there not rules about calling board members out by name? or does this only apply to actual board meetings? BTW who is responsible for authorizing these publications? (the published survey)

I believe the individual is doing her job. She realizes this is a thankless position. But she has the integrity to ask the hard questions and to challenge the logic of her fellow board members. I suspect this is perceived as being mean spirited because she might not hold to the principle that everyone deserves a trophy just for showing up as is being taught to our youth.

As for the cost of living issues. We are all feeling that pain. So why hasn't this board listened to their constituents? You have raised real estate taxes to the highest allowed by law, you insist on funding your extravagantly expensive "pet" projects such as the green energy (which by the way has a failed performance record). Have any of you researched anything about the coming depression? Are you aware that the Federal Government has added trillions of dollars to the country's debt in the past 3 years? When or where do you feel the breaking point is?

I'll leave you with one last thought: you think you have a hostile work environment where trust and communication is at an all time low. Where/when did this start? It all started many many years ago when we were duped into thinking computers are secure, not hackable nor able to be maliciously programmed. If you hold this thought you might want to reevaluate your holding office. and go stick you head back in the sand.
